Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Three Days Reign of Terror The disappointing brother, too, was employed on a sad mission, helping a friend to Gettysburg to find the body of a slain brother; so that within doors we found it as dismal as without, and our first impressions of the great city were any thing but cheering. Our prospect was limited to two rows of brick houses and a broad expanse of house-roofs from our room in the upper story. Nobody was in town, but the streets were jammed with carts and children, and the noise and clatter were incessant and deafening. The weather continued most oppressive, Low, dingy clouds possessed the sky, and not a breath of fresh air was attainable. I thought New York a most dectestable summer residence, and resolved to leave it as soon as possible. On the third morning of our sojourn, however, the sky brightened. The sun attempted to shine, and the papers brought good tidings. Lee was retreating, Meade pursuing, the Potomac rising, and oiuspirts rose with it. At breakfast Central Park was moved and carried by acclamation; but soon some pattering rain-drops brought out an opposition, which induced us to defer our jaunt till settled weather. So we scattered in various directions J.down town, and I to Broadway. But even there I could see nothing attractive. Every thing looked hot, glaring, and artificial, and every body looked shabby, jaded, and care-worn. An overworked horse dropped dead in the street before me, and I was glad to take refuge for a time in the Astor Library. Returning thence at mid-day I first saw signs of disturbance. A squad of policemen passed before me...
