The brands, images, and the cultural output of transnational companies of mainly North American origin are flooding almost every part of the world. What George Ritzer has called McDonaldization, `the rationalization of everyday interaction and individual identity - the principles of a fast food restaurant that `more and more sectors of society are adopting transforms national economies into one global, interdependent economy . As a consequence, activities, which were previously carried out within a national or regulated international framework, will from now on be carried out globally, in accordance...
